Manager comment

Elevated uncertainty across global trade, geopolitics, and policy, alongside strong concentration in AI-related technology, made 2025 a volatile year. Despite this, global markets delivered positive returns, highlighting economic resilience.

Looking ahead, we believe 2026 has the potential to be another constructive year, supported by a generally favorable economic backdrop and ongoing structural growth drivers. At the same time, an evolving policy environment suggests a balanced and diversified investment approach remains essential.

Alongside these growth themes of continued advancement of artificial intelligence, defensive and income-oriented assets continue to play an important role in balanced portfolios. Gold remains a relevant store of value and potential hedge against geopolitical risk, inflation uncertainty, and elevated sovereign debt levels. The healthcare sector, supported by long-term demographic trends and relatively stable demand, offers defensive characteristics alongside selective growth opportunities. In addition, high-quality dividend-paying equities can provide a steady income stream and help dampen portfolio volatility during periods of market stress. Risks nonetheless remain. Trade disputes, geopolitical tensions, and shifting policy priorities continue to shape the investment landscape, reinforcing the importance of global diversification across regions and asset classes to smooth risk and reduce reliance on any single market or theme.

Inflation dynamics remain another key consideration. Accommodative monetary policy, elevated government spending, higher tariffs, and the trend toward deglobalization could place upward pressure on prices and continue to reshape global supply chains. Rising sovereign debt levels are likely to remain a longer-term concern, supporting the case for maintaining exposure to real assets and inflation-resilient sectors.

With markets ending 2025 at relatively elevated levels, short-term volatility or a modest pullback cannot be ruled out as valuations normalize. In response, portfolio positioning has emphasized prudent risk management, including selective profit-taking in overheated areas, broader diversification across sectors and geographies, and maintaining liquidity to capitalize on future opportunities. These measures are designed to protect capital in the near term while preserving participation in long-term growth trends.

Overall, we expect the global economy to remain resilient in 2026, with many of the structural themes from 2025 continuing and, in some areas, accelerating. For balanced investors, maintaining a globally diversified portfolio that blends growth opportunities with defensive assets and income-generating strategies remains an effective way to navigate uncertainty while pursuing sustainable long-term returns.
